OSHA's Crystalline Silica Rule: Construction

OSHA is issuing two standards to protect workers from exposure to respirable crystalline silica—one for construction, and the other for general industry and maritime—in order to allow employers to tailor solutions to the specific conditions in their workplaces.

Who is affected by the construction standard?

About two million construction workers are exposed to respirable crystalline silica in over 600,000 workplaces. OSHA estimates that more than 840,000 of these workers are exposed to silica levels that exceed the new permissible exposure limit (PEL).

Exposure to respirable crystalline silica can cause silicosis, lung cancer, other respiratory diseases, and kidney disease. Exposure can occur during common construction tasks such as using masonry saws, grinders, drills, jackhammers and handheld powered chipping tools; operating vehicle-mounted drilling rigs; milling; operating crushing machines; and using heavy equipment for demolition or certain other tasks.

What does the standard require?

The standard requires employers to limit worker exposures to respirable crystalline silica and to take other steps to protect workers.

The standard provides flexible alternatives, especially useful for small employers. Employers can either use a control method laid out in Table 1* of the construction standard, or they can measure workers' exposure to silica and independently decide which dust controls work best to limit exposures to the PEL in their workplaces.

Regardless of which exposure control method is used, all construction employers covered by the standard are required to:

- ▶ Establish and implement a written exposure control plan that identifies tasks that involve exposure and methods used to protect workers, including procedures to restrict access to work areas where high exposures may occur.
- ▶ Designate a competent person to implement the written exposure control plan.
- ▶ Restrict housekeeping practices that expose workers to silica where feasible alternatives are available.
- ▶ Offer medical exams—including chest X-rays and lung function tests—every three years for workers who are required by the standard to wear a respirator for 30 or more days per year.
- ▶ Train workers on work operations that result in silica exposure and ways to limit exposure.
- ▶ Keep records of workers' silica exposure and medical exams.

What is Table 1?

Table 1 matches common construction tasks with dust control methods, so employers know exactly what they need to do to limit worker exposures to silica. The dust control measures listed in the table include methods known to be effective, like using water to keep dust from getting into the air or using ventilation to capture dust. In some operations, respirators may also be needed.

Employers who follow Table 1 correctly are not required to measure workers' exposure to silica and are not subject to the PEL.

Table 1 Example: Handheld Power Saws

If workers are sawing silica-containing materials, they can use a saw with a built-in system that applies water to the saw blade. The water limits the amount of respirable crystalline silica that gets into the air.

In this example, if a worker uses the saw outdoors for four hours or less per day, no respirator would be needed. If a worker uses the saw for more than four hours per day or any time indoors, he or she would need to use a respirator with an assigned protection factor (APF) of at least 10. In this case, a NIOSH-certified filtering facepiece respirator that covers the nose and mouth (sometimes referred to as a dust mask) could be used. If a worker needs to use a respirator on 30 or more days a year, he or she would need to be offered a medical exam.

Alternative exposure control methods

Employers who do not use control methods in Table 1 must:

- ▶ Measure the amount of silica that workers are exposed to if it may be at or above an action level of 25 µg/m<sup>3</sup> (micrograms of silica per cubic meter of air), averaged over an eight-hour day.
- ▶ Protect workers from respirable crystalline silica exposures above the permissible exposure limit of 50 µg/m<sup>3</sup>, averaged over an eight-hour day. Use dust controls to protect workers from silica exposures above the PEL.
- ▶ Provide respirators to workers when dust controls cannot limit exposures to the PEL.

When are employers required to comply with the standard?

Construction employers must comply with all requirements of the standard by June 23, 2017, except requirements for laboratory evaluation of exposure samples, which begin on June 23, 2018.

Table 1: Specified Exposure Control Methods When Working with Materials Containing Crystalline Silica

NAHB - OSHA Cost Estimates for Silica Standards Woefully Low

The Construction Industry Safety Coalition (CISC) has found that the Occupational Safety and Health Administration's (OSHA) proposed silica standards for the U.S. construction industry will cost the industry $5 billion per year—roughly $4.5 billion per year more than OSHA estimates. The coalition cautioned that the flawed cost estimates reflect deeper flaws in the rule and urged the federal agency to reconsider its approach.

OSHA's proposed rule, intended to drastically reduce the permissible exposure limit (PEL) of crystalline silica for the construction industry, will cost builders about $511 million a year, OSHA said. But CISC estimates that the costs to the industry will actually be approximately 10 times more.

The CISC report estimates that about 80% of the cost -- or $3.9 billion a year -- will be from the additional equipment, labor and record-keeping required. The remaining 20% of the cost ($1.05 billion per year) will come in the form of higher prices that the industry will have to pay for construction materials and building products such as concrete block, glass and roofing shingles. OSHA failed to take into account these additional costs, which will then be passed down to customers in the form of higher prices.

The proposed rule will also translate into significant job losses for the construction industry and the broader economy. The CISC estimates that the proposed regulation would reduce the number of jobs by more than 52,700 yearly: not just construction jobs, but those in related industries such as building material suppliers, equipment manufacturers and architects. Factoring in the many part-time or seasonal jobs, that number could increase to close to 80,000 positions lost.

"We are deeply concerned about the misguided assumptions and cost and impact errors that OSHA has relied upon in creating this proposed rule that will significantly affect our industry," said NAHB Chairman Tom Woods. "This report reveals the critical need for OSHA to withdraw its proposed rule until it can put forth a technologically and economically feasible rule that also works to improve industry workers health and safety."
